

Every day Americans do typical things like use sidewalks, attend job interviews, enter elevators, and use the front door. Now imagine not being able to do these things with ease. Better yet, you miss a doctor's appointment, arrive late to your favorite concert, or are forced to enter a building from the back, all because of unnavigable pathways. This is the reality for some disabled Veterans and individuals with mobility disabilities.

In Paralyzed Veterans of America's latest PSA, Barriers Still Exist – RJ's Everyday Fight, we follow U.S. Army Veteran and PVA member R.J. Anderson of Chicago, IL, who encounters endless accessibility barriers on his way to a job interview. Sadly, R.J. is not alone. A staggering 80% of people with disabilities have encountered an accessibility barrier within the past six months, with more than 1 in 3 having missed important events and appointments due to such barriers.

PVA believes access to public spaces is a fundamental freedom and is leading the fight to build a world where accessibility for all is the norm, not the exception. And you can help. By sharing Barriers Still Exist– RJ's Everyday Fight with your audience TODAY you can encourage others to join PVA's fight for accessibility for all.
